– We are excited to call your attention to a new, live link that appears in all Canvas courses: Simple Syllabus. SMU has just activated this new syllabus creation platform intended to streamline the many syllabus-related tasks faculty face each term. Feedback from faculty and academic governance groups throughout the last year has been overwhelmingly optimistic and favorable. While we are gearing up to provide a full campus launch of the system for fall 2022, Simple Syllabus is available now for use with May term and summer sessions. Faculty experiences and feedback from early users will be reviewed to ensure a pleasant full rollout to campus in the fall. So far, we have observed that Simple Syllabus makes it easy to manage syllabus tasks because it uploads automatically to the SMU Syllabus Library, formats according to accessibility standards, pre-populates required SMU syllabus statements, and automatically publishes a Simple Syllabus page in Canvas. Instructors are able to use rich content editing to add their course-specific content including assignments and their due dates, course policies, etc. The tool seamlessly exports/prints into a PDF and generates unique URLs and embed codes.

– My thanks to Chief Diversity Officer, Maria Dixon Hall, for organizing, and to all the faculty members who participated in yesterday's Town Hall with Black faculty. With more than 65 faculty searches this year and new processes put in place to increase transparency and equity within the search process, we now have more robust data from which we can review outcomes. At the end of this search season, we will share this data in greater detail. A preliminary review shows that overall diversity this year has been 20% - 25% but our composition of African American candidates is not as high (4% - 12%). Working with Dr. Dixon Hall, we will seek to identify variables impacting our ability to attract talented African American scholars and practitioners. I look forward to developing strategies for improvement next year and moving forward.
